The BLUEPRINT

Nampa, Idaho (December 5, 2013) — The BLUEPRINT, a Martin Doblmeier film, shares the story of the commitment to excellence in faith, knowledge, and service that undergirds the Seventh-day Adventist school system—one of the largest private, faith-based school systems in the world.

Through his trademark narrative style, Doblmeier highlights eight schools across the country including Arizona's Holbrook Indian School, and schools in Colorado, Alabama, North Carolina, Maryland and California. One school demonstrates how they are blending academics with hands-on trades, while another shows how they are using lessons in nature to help each child discover their own role in God's creation.

Pacific Press® is pleased to play a role in distributing this outstanding documentary through its Adventist Book Centers and online at www.AdventistBookCenter.com. President Dale Galusha says "Like many of you, I am a product of Adventist education and I passionately believe in it! Every Seventh-day Adventist needs to watch this movie — even those who do not have school-age children. It will not only encourage parents that their children should be in Adventist schools, it will also encourage everyone to support their local elementary school and academy with their time, talents, and dollars."

The BLUEPRINT will broadcast nationwide on PBS stations in early 2014. To own your own copy, take advantage of the special introductory pricing offered by Pacific Press® and the Adventist Book Centers.
